1. Introduction remarks
In the last few decades, a significant transformation in the legal professions in Portugal has occurred in the form of their increasing feminization.¹ Reflecting an optimistic future for this quantitative evolution of women in law, Justice Renilde Abella assumed, in a communication in 1986, that if women, in 13 years' time, tried to organize a conference on women in the legal professions, people would question the aim of such as event.² Such optimism, however, has been accompanied by a paradox, while some individual women have been achieving considerable success in the legal professions, evidence shows that systemic gender barriers in these professions still persist. Several academic and professional investigations as well as judicial reports in several jurisdictions show that issues of equality in law and in the legal professions continue to present challenges.³ Several studies⁴ in various countries confirm the thesis of Margaret Thornton⁵ that women are still 'strange dwellers of the jurisprudential community'.⁶
In Portugal, that phenomenon is rather recent when compared with other countries. Nonetheless, the increasing predominance of female judges and public prosecutors since 2006 has been overwhelming.⁷ These numbers, as well as the growing role of some female magistrates, have attracted the attention of the media and some sectors of the judiciary. A paradigmatic example of this is the recent appointment of the first female State Attorney General in Portugal. However, if in other countries we find detailed analyses of this situation and its consequences, such analyses are still lacking for Portugal. Instead, speculation and stereotyping continue to be relied upon. In this article we sought to analyse the attitudes towards this feminization by judges, public prosecutors and ordinary citizens. For this purpose we conducted

- Étude évaluative sur l'impact des mesures appliquées aux agresseurs (violence domestique) 2022
- Contribution nationale au rapport sur les droits fondamentaux (accès aux droits des femmes victimes de violence) - FRA (2019, 2020, 2021, 2022)
- Les tribunaux au Timor oriental - Les défis d'un système judiciaire en construction (2017)
- Étude d'évaluation des décisions relatives à la violence domestique (2016)
- Trafic de femmes au Portugal à des fins d'exploitation sexuelle (2008)
- Les femmes juges au Portugal : parcours, expériences et représentations (2013)

- Dissonance entre les cadres juridiques et la pratique
- Culture de tolérance judiciaire à l'égard de la violence de genre
- Absence d'évaluation des politiques publiques par des méthodologies adéquates
